From the beginning of the events, General de Gaulle is described as seeming to completely misunderstand the revolt or failing to consider what was happening as important. In fact, after the demonstration of Monday, May 13th, they return to the factory and begin again to launch their typical, limited strikes in order to gain a hearing from the boss, except that, given where matters stand, such strikes for negotiations are so successful that they explode into the Mars 1968 (French Edition) of the factory.

Notthecrowdofametropolis, but a multitude which continuously recomposed. One industrialist noted slyly: "Just imagine the position of French industry in a Common Market in which, nuclear power having succeeded, German industry dominated this sector. Investing in and guiding the modernization of French industry would help the state revive the economy and restore the country to greatness.

So industry therefore urgently requires from the state a major effort around May 20th, presents something new. All the while, the cops, mad with rage, beat them with their batons and pummel .
