Three works were longer. Marita is underdeveloped at best for such an important character, and her love for David and Catherine remains unexplored, and in fact barely remarked. Only Catherine has the destructiveness tendencies. Catherine pursues some wholeness in striving for connection with what the male principle signifies for her... she wants a love relationship with David. It is difficult not to relate the words of the writer-protagonist of The Garden of Eden to the novel itself: This was the first writing he had finished since they were married. So there is a definite denial of underlying motive to his work.
